He succeeded in reaching the hillside that evening then attached his unit to another company of riflemen and established joint defensive positions. This position was isolated from the remainder of the battalion for approximately thirty hours, during which time five sharp enemy counterattacks, supported by tanks, were successfully repulsed. Although twice wounded, Lieutenant Gardner remained in active command until the morning of 12 August, when the severity of his wounds necessitated his evacuation. His dynamic leadership, resourcefulness, and disregard for personal safety in establishing and holding the forward position against strong enemy opposition, was largely responsible for the successful assault on Hill Number 317 by his battalion on 12 August. After securing the hill, he directed establishment of defensive positions. When his communications with the battalion observation post were knocked out by heavy enemy artillery fire, he made his way a distance of about a half-mile through heavy enemy fire of all types, and directed accurate artillery fire on enemy targets. Later that day he led a patrol in the destruction of an enemy machine gun position which was delivering harassing fire upon his troops, capturing four positions. Realizing that reinforcements were needed, and having no communications with supporting units, he returned to the battalion observation post accompanied by an enlisted man of his platoon. Enroute, they encountered enemy machine gun fire, successfully attacked the position killing one German and dispersing the remainder of the crew, then continued on to their objective under enemy artillery and mortar fire. Lieutenant Ball secured infantry support, led the troops to the hill position, then successfully defended the hill against all enemy attacks. He then assisted in the evacuation of casualties to an aid station, under enemy fire. Crossing the field under enemy small arms fire directed at him, Sergeant Causey reached and climbed the hedgerow, where he threw a hand grenade into the enemy gun emplacement, destroying the gun and its crew. Remaining at this position, he covered the advance of his platoon.
